"Birthday party! Bah!" stormed Señor Vanilla, as he paced angrily up and down.

"But, Papacito, a person's birthday ees his one very own day in all the year," pleaded Little Pancho. "Isn't that right, Tommy?" he asked, turning to his friend from up north in the United States.

"Sure," agreed Tommy. "Birthdays are especially special."

Señor Vanilla was not convinced. "Little Pancho cannot waste time. He must learn to fight the bools, not play silly games like Break the Pinata."

"Is that anything like Pin the Tail on the Donkey?" Tommy asked.

"Oh, no. A piñata ees a big jar made of clay." Little Pancho explained. "It ees filled with gifts and all kinds of candy. It hangs up high, and everybody takes a turn hitting at it with a long stick. Wheezikers, it ees a lot of fun when someone breaks it and the goodies fall out. You should see the kids scramble for them. Please, Papacito," he begged, "can't I have a party, so Tommy can see?"

"Sissy stuff!" cried Señor Vanilla. "Better you should spend your birthday hitting at the bool," he added, striding away.

Little Pancho buried his head in his hands, trying bravely to keep from crying. He had hoped so hard for a birthday party.

Tommy felt sorry for his friend. He tried to think of a way to help, but bullfighting was a new kind of problem for him. Then, suddenly, he got an idea, and he ran inside, where he found Señora Vanilla.

"Señora," he exclaimed. "Little Pancho's father wants him to practice fighting the bulls tomorrow instead of having a party!"

"Sí. I heard it all," Señora Vanilla replied, shaking her head sadly. "It ees too bad, but I can do nothing."

"Yes, you can," Tommy declared. "I know a way for Little Pancho to do both."

Bright and early the next morning, Tommy arrived to help Señora Vanilla put their plan into action. They worked hard and fast and kept what they were doing a secret.

Soon, it was time for everyone to be let in on the big surprise. All the children in the neighborhood were gathered on the porch to help Little Pancho celebrate his special day. There were loud shouts and noisy cheers, and everyone was having a wonderful time. Only Tommy was quiet. He was watching his friend, Little Pancho, who was the happiest one of all.

When Señora Vanilla came outside carrying the special birthday piñata, Señor Vanilla approached her and said angrily, "I told you our son was to practice fighting the bool today, birthday or not!"

"And he shall," she replied quietly. "Be patient my husband." Then she hung the big piñata from the ceiling, high above the heads of the happy children.

Señor Vanilla took a close look at it and he jumped back, covering his face.

"Caramba!" he said. "It frightens even me! It ees astounding!"

The piñata was not a regular one. It was made in the shape of a bull, with a ring in its nose and an angry look painted on its determined face.

Little Pancho picked up the long stick, looked straight into the wild eyes of the angry bull piñata, and swung with all his might. In one blow, he broke the piñata and the goodies tumbled out.

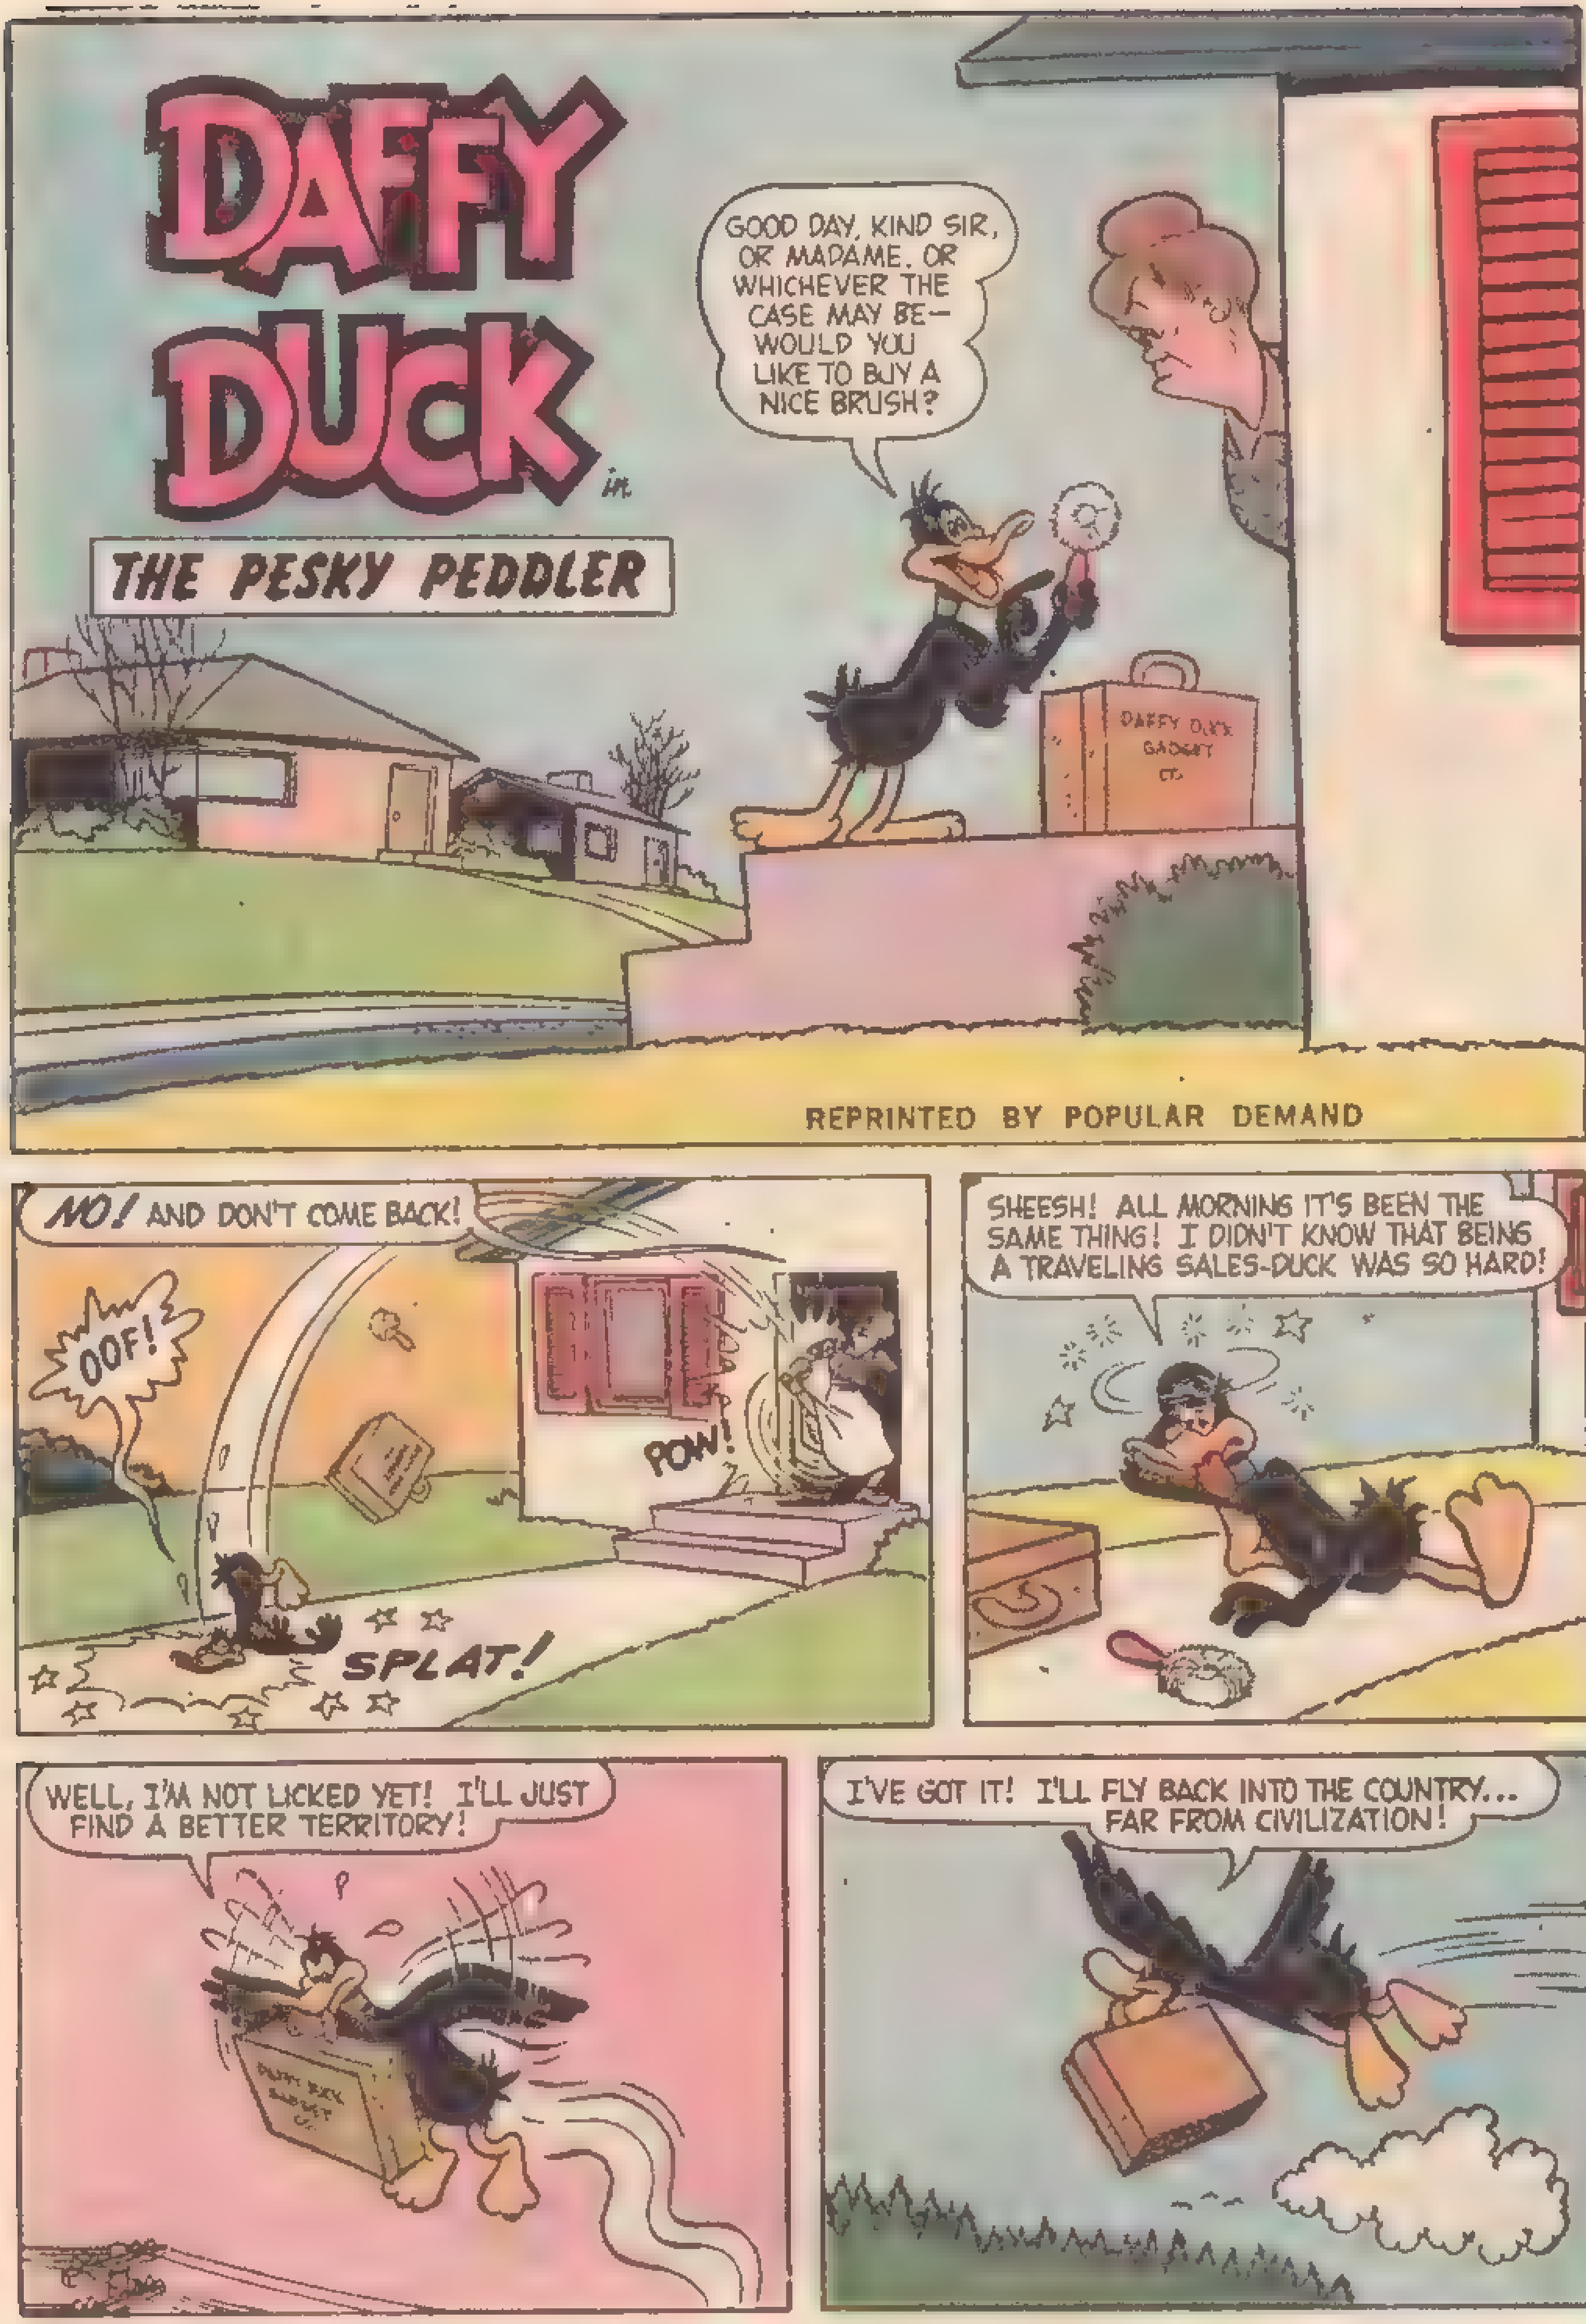

Señor Vanilla cried, "Ole!" and hugged his little son. "Happy birthday!" he laughed.

"Happy birthday!" shouted Tommy.

Little Pancho turned and smiled at his American friend. "It ees the best birthday I ever had and the biggest break. Thanks!"
